(解答番号 ～)

Young Japanese university students like to eat. Most of them love sushi, ramen, and curry.

(), students *are usually on a budget, so they don't have enough money to enjoy some of Japan's most expensive restaurants. Yakitori is usually quite cheap, but most of my students tell me that it is ojisan (old man) food. One popular dish that sometimes gets overlooked is yakiniku. It is popular because students can go to *all-you-can-eat restaurants and it isn't that (). In English, yaki means grilled and niku means meat, so yakiniku literally means grilled meat. In some restaurants, customers actually cook the meat by themselves. It can be a fun way to interact with others, so students often say they like going to yakiniku parties.

In Canada, maki-zushi is very popular with university students () it is very cheap and delicious. Of course, some Canadians think maki-zushi is just called sushi. The two most popular maki-zushi dishes in Vancouver are the California roll and the dynamite roll. The California roll is made with crabmeat and avocado () the dynamite roll is made with shrimp tempura and vegetables.

If you are a young Japanese student and you like to eat a lot of good food while interacting with others, you should try having a yakiniku party in Japan. () you ever visit Canada, you should try the California rolls and the dynamite rolls.

() a conversation is not difficult, really. You just have to say, “Hello.” But then what?

() do you keep the conversation going, especially in a foreign language? Here are two tips to keep in ().

First, ask lots of follow-up questions. These are questions that ask for more information about an established topic. For example, () the other person says that she loves movies. You could then ask, “() is your favorite movie?” There are many possible follow-up questions for any topic, so this is usually () strategy.

Second, use your environment to help you. Clothes and objects can be the () for a good question or comment. For example: “I see you have a badminton racket. I love badminton!

()” This is an easy way to start a new topic that you will both enjoy talking about.

So, the next time you do not know how to continue a conversation, try these tips. And have fun! You will be surprised at () it is to keep talking.
